On Gambling.

It is not very often that we find a partment of the Lincoln Journal. It | 1838. is plain, direct, pointed, and full of good sound sense.

Let our readers study this subject carefully, in all its bearings upon social and business life, and they will be the more determined to see the Journal are worthy to be written in "blazing letters of living light," on the Nebraska fermament, so that they might be a perpetual reminder of duty to Nebraska officials:

"The gambling rooms of the city still remain closed. It is the duty of the police to see that they remain so. The duty of certain other people has been duly and pointedly mentioned by the Journal. By the way, we may suggest to the sporting fraternity that they owe a few duties to the community in this connection. The first is to abandon their calling. The second is to go into some legitimate business. A man who can make a living at gambling can do it equally as well at almost any other calling. The same people. industry, nerve, steadiness and sobriety that are essential to the making of a livelihood and the accumulation of a surplus by gambling would be more sure to attain the desired result in any vocation. It is no hardship to gamblers to force them out of the business. It is no injustice to them and it is a benefit to the balance of the community. There are men in this city who are known as square gamblers-who do not cheat at their game, and who are in a general way clever fellows. These men recognize the truth of what we say. They well as the public that they should abandon their so-called profession. As to blacklegs and sharpers and cappers, their proper place is behind the they would probably go to stealing. The Journal has no wrath or bitterness, no personal feeling of any kind in the matter. It simply desires to agitate the abolition of a great evil law without any more feeling or violence than is absolutely necessary. Knowing public sentiment is a unit, mated till the desired end is accomplished. It has no abuse for the class t desires to see go. It has shown passion aroused, and will not unless the gamblers inaugurate it. If they
